Foliar disease control for cereals with extended protection.

For the 2023 winter cereal season Sumitomo are excited to have commercial volumes of their new foliar fungicide, Metropol. Jock Leys, Business Development Manager for Sumitomo said they were very pleased with what they have seen with Metropol in trials over the past several seasons and in limited commercial applications last year. Metropol is an exciting new option for cereal growers according to Jock, like some other options it combines Group 3 and Group 11 fungicide actives but what makes it unique is that it is the only fungicide to combine the market standard strobilurin active, azoxystrobin with the long lasting DMI active, flutriafol.

Metropol has one of the highest loads of azoxystrobin of any fungicide in this market giving it a longer length of protection combined with a stronger “stay green affect”. When you combine this with the proven flutriafol active that growers and agronomist value for its long-lasting disease control you have a product that will give a longer duration of protection.

One of the main differences between Metropol and other cereal fungicides is its long length of protection, this also brings with it longer withholding periods as it takes longer for the fungicide to drop to below required residue levels within the plant. For people using Metropol at standard timings for grain only crops this is actually a positive as its what gives it longer disease control says Jock, however for those using it on grazing cereals they should be mindful of the grazing withholding requirements on the label.

In last years limited commercial sales the growers and agronomists that got to put some Metropol out where very positive on its performance, all noting that its disease control was excellent. In some trials the increased stay-green effect that high rates of azoxystrobin is known for was also very evident. Where crops have adequate moisture and nutrition at the end of the season this ability to keep the leaf greener for longer can lead to the crop being able to continue to fill grain for longer.
